Announcements

National Science Foundation Regional Innovation Engines

The National Science Foundation's Regional Innovation Engines, or NSF Engines, is seeking regional teams rooted within industry, academia, government, nonprofits, civil society, and communities of practice to catalyze and foster innovation ecosystems across the US to advance critical technologies; address national and societal challenges; promote and stimulate economic growth and job creation; and spur sustainable, regional innovation and nurture diverse talent. The first step to applying to this program is to submit a concept paper, which is due by June 30, 2022. This program requires substantive institutional support and investment, and thus the application process requires institutional coordination. If you are interested in applying to this program, please fill out notice of intent to submit form by the internal deadline of May 31, 2022 by 5:00 p.m.

National Science Foundation Conference

The National Science Foundation is holding its virtual Spring Conference during the week of June 6-10, 2022. Registration is required. For those who cannot attend the live event, all recorded conference sessions will be available on-demand and posted on an NSF website and YouTube page.

New On-Demand Training Resources

The Office for the Vice President of Research and Innovation has launched a new web resource providing access to on-demand training videos developed by Innovation Partnership Services, Research Compliance Services, Research Development Services, and Sponsored Project Services. Training topics range from human subjects research to intellectual property to finding funding for your research ideas. Fill out this form to request access to the full suite of offerings in Canvas.
